Introduction

Software technical documentation is a comprehensive set of documents that provide detailed information about a software product or system. Different types of documents are created throughout the software development lifecycle. Documentation is important as it serves as a reference for developers, users and other stakeholders involved in the software development process. Documentation exists to explain product functionality, unify project-related information, and ensure common understanding between the different stakeholders in a software project.

Revision #1
Created 2 April 2025 19:02:34 by RISA
Updated 2 April 2025 19:02:56 by RISA